HONGKONG, NOVEMBER 10TH, 1888.

The defeat of Mr. CLEVELAND in his candidature for the Presidency of the United States will have been learned with regret by the advocates of free trade. In 1864 Mr.

CLEVELAND, in his contest with Mr. BLAINE, carried twenty states with 210 electoral votes, Mr. BLAINE carrying eighteen with 182 electoral votes, the majority thus being thirty-seven out of a total of 401. During the period of his administration he has filled his high office with credit and dignity and has been personally popular. In the Senate, however, there was a Republican Majority, and the national policy has been affected by conflicting views. Thus in the Canadian fisheries difficulty Mr. CLEVELAND advised a desire to effect a settlement on terms equitable to both parties, and a treaty was negotiated which, if it had been carried into effect, would have laid the controversy to rest. The Senate, however, for party purposes, disapproved the treaty, and a good deal of inflammatory talk against England was indulged in. In their present campaign language of the same tenor has been used by the Republicans, language which has been endorsed by General HANSON, the successful candidate and new President. It remains to be seen how far effect will be given to the views expressed, now that the party has got into power. When the heat of the struggle has subsided calmer counsels will probably prevail, and negotiations will be reopened. But the jealousy of England has been fanned by the Republicans also in connection with the tariff question. The accumulation of money by surpluses in the national budget demanded attention. For the fiscal year ending June 30th last the revenue was estimated at $853,000,000, and the expenditure—$810,817,755, while for the current fiscal year the surplus, excluding the sinking fund, was estimated at over $104,000,000. To get rid of these large sums Mr. CLEVELAND in his message last year recommended a revision of the tariff, and his proposal has since formed the principal theme of political discussion in the States, especially as the election approached. Mr. CLEVELAND denied that his scheme had anything to do with free trade, but as the discussion advanced it was impossible to avoid consideration of the fundamental principles underlying tariff legislation, and many of the Democratic organs which began as simple tariff reformers for fiscal purposes were led on to free trade pure and simple. The Republican organs on their side waxed hotter, at one time went on, in favour of protection, and put it to the working man that to vote for CLEVELAND was to vote for the free admission of the products of the "pauper labour" of Europe (i.e. of England), and the consequent reduction, as was argued, of wages in America. In the cartoons the English lion was always represented coming in lean and going out fat, in one of the San Francisco papers a peculiarly disgusting cartoon appeared recently, in which Mr. CLEVELAND was shown cutting up the body of a working man on the dissecting table, and feeding the hungry lion with the pieces. The same spirit ran through them all, and has no doubt tended to fan the hostile feeling towards England, which had been kindled into existence in connection with the fiduciary question. This feeling is not calculated to be allayed by the action of Sir SAM-UEL WATSON, our Envoy and Minister at Washington, if it be true, as reported in the telegram published in another column, that he has in fact been recalled, after being in the election. Such a thing is proper at any time, was more especially to be regretted in the state of public feeling in the country. It would be absurd to exaggerate the arrangement that exists, but it would be equally absurd to ignore it. War between the United States and England is as remote a contingency, we think, as could well be imagined, although the Standard, the other so foolishly thought it necessary to remind the Americans, in connection with Mr. CLA-VELAND's proposed retaliation against Canada, that England possessed ships and guns.

Mr. CLEVELAND's declaration with reference to restitution, which was naturally adverse to restitution, was commented upon by the English press, was due to political exigency, when the Senate refused to ratify the treaty; which suggested some fair irony in the Arabian Nights. They were brilliantly illuminated, and most tastefully decorated, the occasion being an entertainment given by the host to numerous distinguished friends. Nothing could exceed the genuine geniality of the host, Mr. CLEVELAND, and Jaimejim Fowley to his guests. The programme of the evening comprised music, dancing, refreshments and other items, which, when accompanied with the geniality shown on the present occasion by the host, combine to make a pleasant evening. One of the features of the evening was the stand-up supper, the menu being adapted to the different castes, amongst which were some forty or fifty of the same caste as the host.

CHAPTER XXXIII.

THE SQUIRE SPEAKS HIS MIND.

For a minute or more his father fidgeted about moving his papers backwards and forwards, but saying nothing.

At last he spoke. "You have taken a most serious and painful step, Ida," he said. "Of course you have a right to do as you please; you are full age, and I cannot expect that you will consider me or your family in your matrimonial arrangements."

"In those times I know it is that it is my duty to protect you, and it is that you are doing."

"You are a young man of the world, Ida, in England in order to marry a boyish lad, a man who can hardly support you, whose part in life is played, and who is apparently too idle to seek another."

Ida's eyes flushed ominously, but she made no comment, being apparently afraid to trust herself to speak.

"You are doing this," went on her father, working himself up as he spoke, "in the face of my wishes, and with the knowledge that your action will bring your family, to my sorrow, of course, into disrepute."

"Surely, father, surely," broke in Ida, almost in a fury, "you would not have many one men to whom you could attach yourself?"

"Love I know," said Ida, "but I don't talk to me in that sentimental and schoolboy way—those are too old for it." I am a plain man, and I love in family affection and in duty. Ida. "Love, as you call it, is only too often an other word for self-will and selfishness, and other things that we are better without."

"I am sorry, father," answered Ida, forgetting his manners.

Ida looked up and saw her father's eyes fixed upon her with an expression that seemed to say, "See, you wifful woman, see the ruin that you have brought upon us."

"I do not see why an honest woman should not be allowed to determine which man she will marry, but I do not see why she should be talked of as if though there was something shameful about it. It is all very well to sneer at 'love,' but after all, love is dear, and marriage is not like anything else—it is meant to bind people together, to make them that which is right and righteous, or that which is impure."

"There," said her father, "it is no good your lecturing me on marriage, Ida. If you do not want to marry Cossey I can't force you to. If I tell you to do it, it is one thing."

"Well, I do not care what you do, but I will not have that colonel of yours hanging about me, and I shall write to him to say so."

"I'm thinking, Squire, that if I isn't wanted that day I want to go up to London about a bit of business."

"Go up to London," said the Squire, "why do you want to do there? You were in London the other day."

"Well, Squire," he answered, looking inexorably at him, "the reason of it is nobody's business but mine."

"Oh, all right," said the Squire, his interest dying out. "You are always full of mysteries."

But George shook his fist in the direction of the road down which the dog-cart had driven.

"Ah! if I don't make Boshington, yes, and all England, too, to hold you, my own air."

George. "I'll give you what for, my oackoo, that I will!"

or his health. If this was the case now, what would happen in the Spring when proceedings were actually taken to sell the place?

One bright cold morning she was walking with her father through the fields down the footpath that led to the church, and it was hard to say which of the two looked the paler and more ill. On the way they met Mr. Quest and had an interview with Mr. Quest and much as much as an appeal addressed to him as his pride would allow, only to find the lawyer very courteous, very regretful, but hard as adamant. Also that very morning a letter had reached him from London announcing that the last hope of raising money to meet the mortgage to be paid off had failed.

"It's cruel, warm, cruel," said the sympathetic George, "and you a lawful wedded wife till death do us part." But, mark, I saw a public over the way. Now, no offence, but you'll have just go over and fetch a bite and a sup."

"Well," she answered hungrily, "you're a gent you are, though you're a country one. You are the sort of people that I like, and as for the drink, why, let it be brandy."

"It's brandy it shall be," said the gallant George, and departed.

In ten minutes he returned with a supply of beef pasties, some plates and glasses, with a bottle of good, strong British Brown, which everybody knew is a sufficient quantity to render three private or two blue-jacketed drunk and incapable.

The woman, who now presented a slightly more respectable appearance, seized the bottle and pouring about a wine-glass and a half of its contents into a tumbler mixed it with an equal quantity of water, and drank it off at a draught.

"That's better," she said, "and now for a party. It's a real picnic this."

"It's brandy she has, but she could not eat more than a pint of it, for alcohol destroys the healthy appetite, and she often sees back the brandy bottle."

"Now, Maria, that you are a little more comfortable, perhaps you will tell me how you got into this way, and with a rich husband as I well know to love and cherish you."

"A husband to love and cherish me?" she said: "Why, I have written to him three times to tell him that I am starving, and never a cent has he given me—and there's no allowance due yet, and when this is they'll take it, for I owe hundred."
